I have a synchronised block in which there is an external server call, that could take hours. I want to monitor the caller thread's progress, and maybe give it a change to continue the process. In my case I use an Interlocked.Increment, and checks the internal flag in another thread. However, while I'm doing all that stuff I would like to block the caller thread from doing other things. I guess that would be fine, but what happens if the caller thread gets out of scope (either due to a threadableness move, or the use of a local variable of a different scope) just as I'm checking the flag? Is there a way to not mess up the execution? And in the monitor thread what would happen if I also try to access the flag? Thanks.

A: The most sensible way to go about this would be to switch to a lock-free approach. There's an example here. There's also an explanation here. A: A Monitor with Monitor.TryEnter is an elegant way to do it. If someone else is already inside the monitor, though, it will block. That's because Monitor.TryEnter still enters the monitor, but won't wait. So it's possible to enter, but you can't get out until someone else leaves. A: Unfortunately the memory model is such that it's not safe to block on things like the local variable that you are reading. If you can assume that the value of the flag has already been updated, then you could perform your check of that value by using Interlocked.Exchange.

Lymphocyte subpopulations in the larynx of cervical cancer patients. To investigate the status of T-helper (CD4 +) and T-suppressor (CD8 +) lymphocytes in the larynx of cervical cancer patients by means of the avidin-biotin-peroxidase complex (ABC) immunoperoxidase technique. Eight normal larynges and 56 laryngeal cancer cases were studied. Immunohistochemical studies were performed on frozen sections in avidin-biotin-peroxidase method to detect CD4 + and CD f678ea9f9e
